In my case this is the line: `Directory.GetFiles(directoryLoc, "" & searchStrings & "", SearchOption.AllDirectories)` I can see that I got a lot of sub-folders, but they are so big that it takes some time to list them. I mean, as you know there are about 2000 files, and I only want to show the files which matches a name. Is there a way to just list the files fast without taking so much time and with the right format? A: All of this... `Directory.GetFiles(directoryLoc, "" & searchStrings & "", SearchOption.AllDirectories)` ...is going to cause a performance hit no matter how you turn it. That is because the `GetFiles(...)` method is looking inside each sub-directory and returning a single file list, because the current directory is being walked. Instead, you can use this method, to instead just be given a list of the files matching the `searchStrings` and only return one or more results at a time.

`Directory.EnumerateFiles(directoryLoc, searchStrings, SearchOption.AllDirectories)` ...is going to return all of the results, including the `searchStrings`, and therefore return the extra overhead of the `enumeratefilter`, and the garbage collector is going to complain when the results are no longer needed because the user never looked at them. `List files = new List(); foreach (string file in Directory.EnumerateFiles(directoryLoc, searchStrings, SearchOption.AllDirectories)) { if (File.Exists(file)) { files.Add(file); } }` The `EnumerateFiles(...)` method is going to enumerate sub-directories, and then for each of those it will return one or more matching files. This is a much simpler method. It does, however, require that the `searchStrings` have been properly escaped with the `@` symbols (my example uses the `ReverseWildcardDirectories` option) so that the file names do not match the `searchStrings`. The default option is the `AllDirectories` option, but you can use the `ExcludeSubDirectories` option if you want to ignore the sub-directories you do not want

Most vehicles today are produced with aluminum bodies so that the weight of the parts of the body is minimized. However, the raw material outlay for aluminum vehicles of this type are costly. Also, because aluminum is cold cast and in many cases flame-in-quenched, after which the car is painted, heating means in the manufacturing process are very important. An increasingly important aspect of manufacturing is the development of systems that heat assembly operations performed at a series of stations over the length of the body. The requirement for a warm room, as well as the ability to perform operations at higher speeds, requires very efficient heating means. It is therefore an object of the present invention to provide a method of assembling an articulated vehicle body which requires fewer parts than prior art processes. It is another object of the present invention to provide a method of assembling an articulated vehicle body that allows rapid and efficient heating of the assembled body. It is a further object of the present invention to provide a method of assembling an articulated vehicle body that allows the entire vehicle body to be heated efficiently to a desired temperature. It is still another object of the present invention to provide a method of assembling a vehicle body that provides heating systems that are simple, versatile and applicable to a variety of different vehicle models. It is a further object of the present invention to provide an articulated vehicle body that can be produced at a reduced cost. These and other objects will be apparent to one of ordinary skill in the art.Q: Detect click after page closes and execute a function (jQuery) I have an issue trying to detect a click on a button after the page has been closed. Here are the steps I took: I added an "X" in the corner of the page using: `$(document).ready(function(){ $(window).click(function(){ $(".close").click(); }); });` Then, I added the following code to close the window: `$(".close").click(function(){`
